With the COVID-19 Pandemic hovering over us for the last 6 months and with no signs of its retreat in the near future, the health, wellbeing, and education across the world are at risk. According to UNESCO, over 90% of students worldwide are affected and the education of more than 1.6 billion of the global population of school-aged children and young people has been suddenly disrupted. It is imperative to understand that despite the various commotions created all around because of COVID-19 pandemic, the process of teaching and learning must continue. With this thinking, the Department of Environmental Science has taken lead in organizing various events for the students during this pandemic to keep them engaged. The students have been given various interesting home assignments such as the drawing, painting, videography, quiz competitions, etc that keeps their mind engaged with productive activities.

On eve of the International Youth Day, celebrated every year on 12th August, an intercollege painting competition was organized by the Department. The theme of the competition was COVID-19: as a Public Health Threat. Since the theme is a burning topic right now, it was thought to have an idea of what impressions it has left on the minds of students. How do they perceive it, what should be the way out, what precautionary and safety measures should be taken in order to be safe from this life-threatening pandemic. The event received a good response with students from different colleges of the Valley participating in it. A total of 42 entries were received. Students had beautifully depicted their ideas on paper and done justice to the theme of the competition. It was very difficult to choose the best three entries from the lot. But after thorough discussions, the following were declared as the top entries of the competition:
